The idea of law is an ideal of freedom, or independence from the power of others. The moral value and justificatory force of law are not contingent upon circumstance, but intrinsic to its character as law. Doctrinal legal arguments are shaped by rival conceptions of the conditions for realization of the idea of law. This book argues that the institutions of law and the structures of legal thought are best understood by referencing the moral ideals of freedom. The idea of law is an ideal of freedom, or independence from the power of others. Some institutions can be properly understood only when they are viewed as imperfect attempts to realise moral or political ideals; and some ideals can be conceived only by reference to their expression in institutions. We take for granted the idea that authorities must decide upon the content of the law. In itself, therefore, law seems to be morally neutral, deriving any moral.
